History

Phase #1: The first phase of land reclamation west of Cunningham Pier sometime before 1893 and until as late as 1897, when Seawall #1 was probably built to act as a promenade to the Western Beach Baths, and to provide additional land for the GHT (Downes, 1893; G288).

Phase #2: The area of land reclamation was extended further west sometime after 1897 (G288, when a second seawall (#2) was built from the Western extremity of Seawall #1 extending to the Western Beach Gents Baths (western end of the Lew Marine site), where it is shown in 1927 (G347) as terminating at the eastern edge of the bath's swimming pool structure.

Phase #3: Sometime after 1927 (G347), the wall was again extended past the extant baths, to the current site of the north eastern corner of the Western Beach Boat Club, where it cut diagonally across the current site to the foreshore near where the current clubhouse now stands.

Phase #4: Further land reclamation was undertaken sometime around the late 1950s, when the rest of the current Western Beach Boat Club site was filled, leaving the current boathouse landlocked, whereas it had formerly been set over the water. The site had been leased after the Corio Bay Rowing Club moved back to the Barwon River, and was filled to provide further boat hard storage space (Ethyll, 2004:1).
