Interpretation of Site	Small scale mining site. Probably single phase exploratory gold mine consisting of a single heading, 5M in length driven south-west into the hillslope, with prominent spoil heaps on each side. Located 100m to the south-east of the Poverty Gully (water) Channel, but appears unrelated to this channel. Additional earthworks lie within the woodland to the south-west. These have been partly disturbed by a forest access road.
Historical Significance	Site may contribute to understanding of local 19th century mining history.
Archaeological Significance	Part of the 19th century mining landscape in the region. The site is of potential regional significance for evidence for mining exploration in an area with few other mining remains. The main part of the site lies in pasture and is moderately well-preserved. It may contain sub-surface features and artefacts. The site is a good example of a small-scale exploratory mining venture, probably dating to the mid 19th century.
