Statement of Significance

Last updated on -

53 Harp Road, Kew, is of local historical and architectural significance as a representative and externally relatively intact, albeit late, example of a corner bay type of suburban bungalow, featuring a simple and dominant roof form placed above a front elevation of central door and porch and three-quarter circular corner bay, with a pyramidal roof with corner strut. While a simple and restrained composition, the house has a commanding presence on this irregular corner site.

Physical Description 1

The house at 53 Harp Road, East Kew is a single-storey interwar bungalow of brick construction on a square plan on a prominent corner siting. A low-slung hipped roof has a pyramidal structure which extends out to a bracketed strut form at the south-east corner, highlighting a semi-circular planned bay window; further west, at the centre of the principal elevation, it is supported by a pair of stone piers which define the recessed main entrance porch. The roof is finished with non-original glazed terracotta tiles and features tall plain brick chimneys and exposed rafters. The principal south and east elevations display a roughcast rendered finish on a clinker brick plinth with matching string course, whereas the other elevations have an overpainted brick finish. Fenestration is generally arranged in long bays with timber-framed casement sash box frames and leadlight glazing, which further enhances the overall horizontality of the design.

Rear alterations and additions carried out in the 1980s and 1990s are visible from the side street.[i]

The front and side fences retain sections of low stone wall and piers with non-original red brick piers and timber pickets and the original garden has been largely replanted with native vegetation.
