Statement of Significance

Last updated on -

An elevated characteristic timber Californian Bungalow, which is the last remaining relatively intact 1920s house on this side of the street, in good condition. One of two linked groups and built about 1925. This side of Vernon Street is characterised by unusually deep blocks in which the houses were set well back. It has historical significance to Maroondah, with others of these groups, as a representative embodiment of rural family life in Croydon in the 1920s, after the Great War. It is architecturally significant for its setting, including its boundary of trees and its surviving garage of the period.

Physical Description 1

An elevated, double-fronted timber Californian Bungalow with a gable roof across, set well back on the site. It is the last relatively intact house of this period surviving on this side of the street, of the many there once was. The left bay is set forward. The upper section is shingled with a palisade vent at the top. The roof is clad with cement Marseilles tiles, with a plain brick chimney. At right is a shallow centred bay window with shingled soffit. The porch is in the angle, under the projecting roof, with balustrades. Upper sashes are leadlight. The garden has several mature trees, which form an avenue to the garage at extreme rear and in the nature strip.

Intactness

Good. The left window may have been replaced.
