Physical Description 1

The design of this typical Californian Bungalow style weatherboard house was probably drawn from the State Savings Bank pattern books, which were prepared under the supervision of the bank's chief architect, GB Leith (of well-known architectural firm, Leith & Bartlett). The style's overlapping roof gables and shingling are seen in many examples throughout the suburbs, the Edwardian-era front door used in this example marking the often conservative choice of western suburban house builders.

Although not original, the woven wire front fence is a type that is typical of the era.
