Statement of Significance

Last updated on - January 1, 1900

What is significant?

This Werribee Blue Box grows on the northern bank of the Werribee River in Hopetoun Park, along a green corridor to the south of residential housing. This area is part of the traditional lands of the Wurundjeri people.

It is an outstanding three-trunked specimen and is an exceptionally tall example of the species. There are a number of Werribee Blue Boxes along this section of the catchment, with at least 3 considered to be of Regional significance (T12431, T12432, T12433). Several other specimens in the area are currently being assessed.

How is it significant?

This Werribee Blue Box is significant for scientific reasons at the Regional level.

Why is it significant?

This tree is scientifically significant for outstanding size, age and rarity, and as an important source of seed.

The Werribee Blue Box was first identified as a morphologically distinct subspecies of Eucalyptus baueriana in 2011, and is classified as endangered in Victoria. Its distribution is restricted to the Werribee River catchment around Bacchus Marsh and downstream, growing close to watercourses and drainage lines in alluvial soils. The Werribee Blue Box population is estimated to be only a few thousand, most of which occur in the northern part of the distribution along the Coidama and Djerriwahrr Creeks, which flow through Lake Merrimu Reservoir Reserve and Long Forest Flora Reserve.

This is an outstanding large and healthy three-trunked specimen. The species is typically a small tree averaging 3-12m tall, however this specimen reaches a height of 18.8m.
