Statement of Significance

Last updated on -

The former Vicarage is of local historical and architectural significance. The house is a largely intact example of a Federation bungalow, popular in Heidelberg and Ivanhoe, and was designed by prominent Melbourne architects Eggleston and Oakley. The house has historical connections to the Anglican Church in Heidelberg.

Physical Description 1

The Former Vicarage is an attic Federation bungalow style residence, with steeply pitched gabled Marseilles-patterned terracotta tiled roofs. The house is clad with horizontal weatherboards to dado height and roughcast, pebble-dash render above, extending into the gables. The attic window within the gable end facing Banksia Street has a weatherboarded balcony supported on timber brackets.

Historical Australian Themes

Ivanhoe and Heidelberg went through a period of rapid expansion after the extension of the railway in 1901. The former Anglican Vicarage is one of the later houses built at this time.
