Statement of Significance

The Railway Station Estate - Wright & Edwards Heritage Area is of regional historical and architectural significance as a sub-division first developed in the speculative boom of the 1880s. This related to the industrialisation of the area and the creation of a new suburb - the township of Braybrook Junction. The few remaining houses of the early 1890s are amongst the oldest in the district and are a remarkable survival from the era of the 1890s Depression, when many newly-built houses were moved.

This subdivision is also significant for its diversity and the range of housing from different periods, especially the years immediately following the establishment of H.V. McKay's Sunshine Harvester Works at Braybrook Junction. The area provides an interesting comparison with H.V. McKay's housing estate, since many of his Ballarat workers moved or built homes here in the early years of the 20th century. The neighbourhood's population more than doubled in ten years, with further expansion in the 1920s -30s and during and after World War Two, creating consistent streetscapes of freestanding, single storey timber houses with a consistent garden setback.

Physical Description 1

All the original allotments in this rectangular grid subdivision were 40 foot frontages. Several of the original 'lanes', between the blocks, can still be seen. In some cases, two houses were built on one allotment. The best examples of this re-subdivision process can be seen in the row of 1890s houses in Benjamin Street. This row of five single-fronted detached brick Victorian houses has simple parapet ornament, corrugated iron verandahs and iron lace (some original). This parapeted row house type in the form of detached brick cottages is unique in Sunshine. Six houses were built on three of the original subdivision blocks (two to a block). These blocks were originally 40 foot frontage, with a 120 foot depth. One of the houses (the second from the east end of the group) has subsequently been demolished. The facades have had details altered, some with windows replaced, others having the cast iron ornament removed or altered, probably representing attempts to undo renovations of the mid twentieth century.

At least eleven houses survive from the early 1890s subdivision, including the five singlefronted houses in Benjamin Street (Numbers 25, 29, 31, 33, 35); one single-fronted house in Morris Street (No. 179); the house of Edmund Parsons at 114 Morris Street; and the house at 51 Stanford Street. Outside the precinct boundaries are 1890s houses at 46 Chapman Street (altered), and reputedly 79 Couch Street (though this is not obvious from its present form).

While the subdivision and the first few houses date to late nineteenth century, most of the Heritage Area was developed in the first half of the twentieth century. Some houses in the area are said to have been moved here from Ballarat, when H.V. McKay's workers followed him to Braybrook Junction in 1907. These houses, ranging from Edwardian, through building booms in the interwar period and early postwar period, provide consistent streetscapes of freestanding, single storey timber houses with mostly iron roofs, with a consistent garden setback. Edwardian houses in the Heritage Area, of c1905-1915, tend to have an asymmetric facade, with a projecting gable (often half-timbered) and a bullnose verandah on the other side. The roof is otherwise hipped, and often quite tall with a tiny gablet at the peak. They have singlepane sash windows or groups of casement windows, often beneath a decorative timber hood. The doors are solid four-panelled, like the Victorian houses, or have an upper arched pane of glass, and have both highlights and sidelights. Chimneys are similar to the Victorian ones, or have rendered mouldings at the top. Intact examples include: 2 and 70 Benjamin Street; and 95, 97, 101, 120, 122, 144 and 169 Morris Street.

There are many houses from c1915-25 that have features both of the Edwardian and California Bungalow houses, and can be called 'Transitional' or 'Federation Bungalows'. These houses have hipped roofs, but at a much lower pitch than was seen in the Edwardian period. They usually have a half-timbered front gable, also with a lower pitch. The verandah details - turned posts and a timber frieze - are similar to those of Edwardian houses.

The verandah roof, however, is a plain skillion and often extends across the entire facade, supported on timber brackets, as was common to California Bungalows. Chimneys are plain and narrow, some with bands of clinker bricks. Intact examples include: 10, 48 and 75 Benjamin Street; and 99-105, 106 and 161 Morris Street.

California Bungalows, of the 1920s, are one of the most common types in the Heritage Area, particular in its western half. They have gabled roofs - either facing the street or parallel to it, though some of the earlier ones still have low hipped roofs. There is usually a smaller gable facing the street which may be half-timbered, rendered or shingled. Front verandahs have skillion or hipped roofs, and are often carried across the entire facade. Verandah supports tend to be heavy and range from paired timber posts resting on masonry (brick or render piers), and tapered masonry piers or simple cast-concrete columns on top of a low masonry wall. Verandahs often have simple triangular brackets. The ends of roof rafters tend to be visible. Windows often have multiple panes in the upper sash. Some of them have box frames that project from the wall of the house; others are grouped in angled bays. Doors of this era had a high-set window above shallow panels or vertical boards, and sometimes a sidelight. Intact examples include: 4, 49 (1930s), 61 and 82 Benjamin Street; 49 Hampshire Road; and 117, 123, 145, 162 and 164 Morris Street.

Houses of the 1930s and early 1940s tend to have tiled hipped roofs, some with a projecting hipped-roof bay. Verandahs have simple brick or render supports. Windows often have geometric leadlights in the upper sashes, and are grouped in twos and threes. Later windows have horizontal glazing bars, and can be found on the corner of the building. There are several exceptions among houses of this era as some were built in the late 1930s in earlier styles, such as Transitional and California Bungalow designs. Intact examples include: 5, 7, 32 and 95 Benjamin Street; 142 Morris Street; and 45 Stanford Street.

Early post-war houses of c1945-55 demonstrate the second main period of housing development in the Heritage Area. They are double fronted with a hip roof and projecting hipped bay to create an asymmetric facade. Roofs are often clad with tiles, in contrast to houses of the earlier periods. Timber windows are placed in banks to create a horizontal format, and some are placed at corners, continuing the late interwar style. Front porches are minimal in size and either set below the roof line or beneath a concrete slab roof. Decoration is minimal and is often limited to stepped 'waterfall' chimneys, which often are a major feature of the facade, and porch detailing in cream brick. Intact examples include: 81 and 89-93 Benjamin Street; 33 and 46 Hampshire Road; and 115 and 124 Morris Street.

The surviving houses that are contributory to the precinct include the following:

Physical Conditions

Condition

While some houses are altered, the group retains sufficient integrity to identify the original character. Recent renovations have both conserved original features, but also resulted in loss of details. Typical alterations are the replacement of original timber windows with aluminium units, removal/replacement of original verandah supports, and covering weatherboards with vinyl or aluminium siding.
