Statement of Significance

Last updated on - June 20, 2005

A palace amongst humpies: that is an unusually large, complete and well-documented example of an improvised structure of sort once fairly common, especially in the depression years, but which has rarely survived. It is clad and was once roofed in flattened-out kerosene tins, some still bearing their original brands. There are no windows, but the upper floor has awning hatches clad in the same way as the walls. Its interest is enhanced by the inventive and adaptive character of the owner, still evidenced by the tools which he created for cutting the tins, and by his inventions, such as the patent rabbit exterminator. The surviving antique and other furniture is in striking contrast to the building and illustrates the lifestyle maintained by Jones and his sisters under adverse conditions . The survival of the site in a semi-natural state enhances the buildings.
